This game is based on Action, Adventure,.SINGAPORE: A first-of-its-kind research programme aims to improve the health of the planet by studying insects and understand how they live in an increasingly built-up environment. The study will focus on the effects of urbanisation on the cities of the world's smallest, least-documented and most diverse animal kingdom. "The opportunity presented by the insects to us is unlike any other opportunity to study nature in a manner that will allow us to identify new threats to the environment," said Richard Waite, associate professor of zoology at Singapore's National University of Singapore (NUS). The Centre for Urban Biodiversity, which began this month, is the first such facility in Singapore, and one of only two worldwide. The programme will be led by NUS professor Waite. On top of his research, he will be responsible for managing the centre, carrying out the other researcher's experiments and putting together the findings. CUB is unique not only because of the talent involved, but also because it will focus on insects from the tropics, in other words the insects of Singapore, Waite said. "The other environmental research centres are focused on the insects in temperate regions and deserts," he said. "What we have is a unique opportunity to examine the role of insects in tropical cities." According to Waite, these cities have become a breeding ground for insects. "Over the last few decades, we have seen many dramatic increases in the insect populations due to a number of factors, including improved transportation and increase in industrial activities
